April 2010

Dear Parents

The only relationships in this world that have ever been worthwhile and enduring have been those in which one person could trust another. Every interaction with every person is a moment of trust. The way you behave in that moment will either build or diminish trust and this opportunity is geometric. How you behave with one family member is noticed by other family members. How I behave with one parent and students is discussed by other parents and students. It is the ripple effect. By behaving in ways that build trust with one, you build trust with many.

However in order for these relationships to endure, the important thing is to realize that each relationship has two trust accounts. The way you perceive the amount of trust in a relationship and the way the other person perceives it. They may be different. Thus there are no facts only interpretations. If this is clearly understood then conflicts fade away. This is a very important point to remember especially as our children are stepping into adulthood. They need to believe that we adults can be trusted and we in turn should learn to build a strong bond based on trust or else all our efforts will be in vain.

On the eve of the Bengali New Year, let us vow to take a good look and assess all our relationships once again and ponder how to build up trust, work at it and see that it endures.
